Spray Guns and Hose Nozzles Specification Sheet

The spray gun is the product the customer actually holds, so it carries the whole range's perceived quality. This family runs from a plain adjustable plastic nozzle up to a chrome plated metal eight pattern gun, with the same trigger architecture underneath, so a retail wall can show four price points that visibly belong together.

Why This Family Is Built This Way

- Seven eight and nine pattern heads share the same body so artwork and packaging stay consistent
- Chrome plated versions of the metal guns give a premium finish without a new tool
- Soft coated grips across the mid range for wet hand use
- Blister card packing with published carton data on every model

Problems It Solves

- Ranges that jump from a cheap plastic nozzle straight to an expensive gun with nothing in between
- Pattern dials that stiffen after one season of outdoor storage
- Buyers who need a metal look at a plastic landed cost
- Ranges with no obvious hero product at the top of the wall

Questions Buyers Ask

What is the difference between a seven eight and nine pattern head?

Pattern count is the number of spray settings on the rotating dial such as jet, mist, shower, cone and flat. Nine pattern heads read as the premium option on shelf. The underlying mechanism is the same, so all three can run in one programme.

Are the metal guns solid metal?

The metal spray guns use a metal body and trigger with plastic internals. Models coded D are chrome plated over the same body. We publish net and gross weight for every model so you can compare actual material content.

Do the guns fit standard quick connectors?

Yes. Every gun in this family is designed to clip onto the connectors in our hose fitting range, which is why most customers buy the two families together.

Can we have our own colour?

Colour changes are a normal part of a private label programme. Send your Pantone references with your order quantity and we will confirm what is achievable on each body.

What is the sample lead time?

Sample delivery is 30 days. Stock samples of existing models can usually go out faster.
